WORK:

"For the past ten years or so, I have been organising a pictorial expression around the notion of the centre. This centre can be the breath of chaos, organising the canvas like a fractal world around what we call a strange attractor pole, a kind of abyss, a counterpoint to the profusion it orders.

It can also be the constitution of organisations similar to mandalas, linking aggregates or groups of graphics to a centre, a light, a soul (as we speak of the light or soul of a tube, a hollow cylindrical object). These graphics are not unlike the foliage found, for example, in Muslim art, and sometimes also resemble certain marks left by the elements on stones, rock and sand.

These forms are organised into networks and circuits. Their ability to aggregate, according to the randomness inherent in the phenomenon of their construction, creates a dynamism quite similar to the movement of a fluid, such as water traversed by a network of light waves.
